Hauf, Sc. f. HALF; var. of HOWFF Sc.

Haugh (hāχ, hāχ^w, hāf). Sc. and north. dial. Forms: 4 halche, 4–6 hawch, 4–7 hawgh, 5– haugh (8 haw); also in north. Engl. halgh as in Greenhalgh. [app. a phonetic descendant of OE. healh, halh 'corner, nook' (see HALE *sb.*2): cf. Sc. sauch, saugh: –OE. sealh; Sc. tauch = ME. talȝ.]

A piece of flat alluvial land by the side of a river, forming part of the floor of the river valley.

The original sense was perh. 'corner or nook (of land) in the bend or angle of the river'. A northern stream usually crosses and recrosses the floor of its valley, striking the base of the slope on each side alternately, and forming a more or less triangular 'haugh' within its bend, on each side in turn.

Have (hæv), v. Forms and Inflexions: see below. [A Common Teutonic vb.: OE. habban, hæfde, hafed, = OFris. hebba, hēde, hēved, hēved, OS. hebbian, habda, -habd, -hādd (MDu., Du. hebben, hadde, gehad, MLG. hebben, hân, hadde, gehat), OHG. habēn, habēta, gihabēt (MHG. habēn, hâte, gehabet, Ger. haben, hatte, gehabt), ON. hafa, hafða, haft (Sw. hafva, hafvde, haft. Da. have, havde, havt), Goth. haban, habaida, habaid-:—OTeut. stem habē-.* On account of its correspondence in form and sense with L. habē-re, generally referred to a hypothetical Aryan radical form khabhē-.* The OE., OFris., and OS. had in all parts of the present, exc. 2nd and 3rd sing. pres. Ind., the stem habǰ- (from habē-), reduced by gemination to habb- (hæbb-, hębb-), while these two persons and the past retained hab- (hav-, haf-); hence OE. habban, hæbbe, habbad, hæbbende, etc., beside hafast (hæfst), hafaþ (hæfþ), hæfde, hæfed. In ME. the hæbb- forms were gradually reduced by levelling to hav- (have(n, I have, they have n, having); while the original haf- (= hav-) forms at length lost their f (v), before the following consonant (ha-st, ha-th, ha-s, ha-d). Even the later v, for OE. bb, was worn down in colloquial and dialect speech, so that OE. habban passed through ME. hai-ben, haven, han, to later ha, ha', Sc. hae. These phonetic weakenings, due largely to the weakness and stresslessness of the word in many uses, both as principal verb and as auxiliary, have given rise to a very great number of historical forms for every inflected part, a number further increased by the graphic interchange of f, v, and u, and by the frequent dropping of initial h. The ne plus ultra of all these tendencies is seen in the reduction of OE. habban to a, or its entire elision, as in I would a been, occas. Sc. I wad been. In ordinary English, contracted forms are now only colloquial or metrical, in I've, thou'st, he's, we've, I'd, he'd, we'd. By coalescence with ne, this verb had also, in OE. and early ME., as in OFris., a negative form nabban, nave, which held in OE. the rank of an independent word (cf. will, nill, L. volo, nōlo); it is here included under the positive form.]

B. Signification.

From a primitive sense 'to hold (in hand)', have has passed naturally into that of 'hold in possession,' 'possess,' and has thence been extended to express a more general class of relations, of which 'possession' is one type, some of which are very vague and intangible. For just as the verbs be and do are the most generalized representatives of the verbal classes κείσθαι (situs) and πράττειν (*actio*n in Aristotle's classification of verbal predications (κατηγορίαι), so have is the most generalized representative of the class ἔχειν (habitus, having). For although have in its primitive sense of 'hold' was a verb of action, in the sense 'possess,' and still more, in the weakened senses 2, etc. below, no notion of any action upon the object remains, what is predicated being merely a static relation between the subject and object. In the older languages this relation was often predicated not of the possessor but of the thing possessed, the possessor standing in the dative, thus Is eat mihi liber, there is to me a book, I have a book. The extended use of have and its equivalents to express this relation is a general feature of the modern languages. Like the two other generalized verbal types be and do, have also tends to uses in which it becomes a mere element of predication, scarcely capable of explanation apart from the context, and at length an auxiliary verb.

c. To have and to hold, a phrase app. of legal origin (cf. law L. habendum et tenendum: see Habendum), retained largely, as in German, Dutch, etc., on account of its alliterative form: To have (or receive) and keep or retain, indicating continuance of possession.

2. To hold or possess, in a weakened sense; the relation being other than that of property or tenancy, e.g. one of kindred, relative position, etc.

The relation is often reciprocal: the father has a son, the son has a father; the king has subjects, his subjects have a king; the man has a wife, she has a husband; or it may be reciprocal to sense 1: a man has (sense 1) a house, the house has an owner or tenant.

* Phrases.

21. Have is used in numerous phraseological expressions, which are treated under their distinctive words; e.g. to have ADO, h. at AVAIL, h. BUSINESS, h. in CHARGE, h. CONCERN, h. COURSE, h. DONE, have an EYE on or to, h. a FINGER in, h. at one's FINGER ENDS, h. a HAND in, h. in HAND, h. on HAND, h. at HEART, h. a MIND, h. ON (clothes), have it OUT, h. PART, h. RECOURSE, h. under one's THUMB, h. in VIEW, h. the WIND of, etc.

 Idiomatic uses.

22. The past Subjunctive had = would have, is used idiomatically with adjectives (or adverbs) in the comparative, as better, liefer, sooner, rather; in the superlative, as best, liefest; or in the positive with 'as', as good, as lief, as soon, as well, to express preference or comparative desirability.

In the earliest form of these expressions, in OE. the adjs. lēofre, betre were construed with be and the dative, e.g. him wǽre betere = it would be better for him. In ME., side by side with this, appears have and the nominative, in the sense 'he (I, etc.) would hold or find it better or preferable'. The use with the positive, and superlative, and the extension to rather are later; the use of as soon, sooner, well, is recent, since liefer and better began to be felt as adverbs. (See exhaustive treatment by F. Hall in Amer. Jrnl. Philol. II. 281.) The following instances illustrate this idiom generally; fuller illustration will be found under the several words.

II. As an auxiliary verb. As in the other Germanic (and Romanic) languages, the various moods and tenses of have are used with the pa. pple. of another verb, to form a series of compound or 'perfect' tenses of the latter, expressing action already finished at the time indicated, and answering to the Latin perfect tenses dedi, dedcram, dedero, dedisse, etc.

This use arose directly from sense 2 b, the object possessed having in agreement with it a passive participle of a transitive verb as attribute or complement; thus, I have my work done = 'I possess or have my work in a done or finished condition', whence, by inference of antecedent action from result, the actual sense 'I have done my work': cf. the series 'have you the article ready?', 'have you the article completed?', 'have you completed the article?' In some dialects the distinction between the original and developed forms, e.g. 'He has the house built', 'he has built the house', is still in regular use; with some past participles, as begun, completed, done, finished, etc., it is recognized generally. With transitive verbs the developed use was already frequent in OE.; the pa. pple., which originally agreed in number and case with the object, was sometimes left uninflected. In early ME. the usage is found with verbs of action without an object, whence it was extended to intransitive verbs, especially, at an early date, to the verb to be (as in French and other Romanic languages, and in opposition to continental Teutonic use), as he has been, had been, will have been, etc. (cf. F. il a été, Ger. er ist gewesen). Verbs of motion and position long retained the earlier use of the auxiliary be; and he is gone is still used to express resulting state, while he has gone expresses action. See BE 14 b.

24. The present tense of have, forms a present of completed action, or 'present perfect'. a. To a trans. vb. with object.

In 14–15th c., association with the Engl. have, having, introduced the variants haver, havoir, havour, and the h was established before 1500. Subsequently the termination of both words passed through -cour to -iour (cf. saviour, and vulgar 'lovier'); the original sense 'possession' became obs.; and, in the new sense, haviour came down alongside of behaviour, of which it may often have been viewed as a shortened by-form.]

He (hī, hĭ), pers. pron., 3rd sing. masc. nom. Forms: see below. [The simplest form of the (orig. demonstr.) base hi-, which supplies not only the pronoun forms him, his, her, (h)it, (h)em, but also the adverbs here, hence, hither. OE. he, hē was cogn. with OFris. hi, he (fem. hiu, neut. hit), OS. hi, he, hie. The other old Teutonic langs. (with OS. in the oblique cases) have parallel forms from stem i-: OHG. ir, er, Goth. is. Fragments of a hi- stem, in sense 'this', are found, however, in Gothic, in dat. himma, acc. m. and n. hina, hita; they differ only in the initial h from the corresponding inflexions of is 'he'. In OHG. the East Franconian had also her in place of the usual OHG. er, 'he'. In English, the typical form in all ages has been he, from which emphasis probably produced heo, hye, hee, and tonelessness hŏ, ă, which last long prevailed in representations of familiar speech, as in the dramatists, and is still a prevalent dialect form. In OE. the base he supplied all parts of the third personal pronoun, singular and plural; it was thus inflected:

SING.	MASC.	FEM.	NEUT.	PLURAL.
Nom.	hi, he	hīo, hēo, hīe, hī	hit	hī, hīe, hēo, hīg
Acc.	hiene, hine (hyme)	hie, hī (hēo)	hit	hī, hīe, hēo, hīg
Dat.	him (hym)	hiere, hire (hyre)	him	him, heom (hym)
Gen.	his (hys)	hiere, hire (hyre)	his	hiera, hira, heora

1. In all the cognate languages, even in the early period, certain parts of the hi- or i- stem were lost, and supplied by the corresponding parts of the demonstrative base syi-, a derivative of sā, SHE. This extended to English also in the 11th or 12th c. when the fem. hio, heo, became supplanted by the fem. demonstrative sio, syo, which appears as sco, scho—sho in northern, and scæ=shē in midl., now SHE, q.v. In the south and west heo (ho, hoo) survived in literature till the 15th c. and is still native in the dialects in various forms; but she has been the only literary Eng. form since the introduction of printing. In the oblique cases HER remains.

2. The original plural has been supplanted by a plural of the demonstrative that. In the northern dial. c 950, the O.E. þā, plural of þæt, was often used instead of hīa, hī; within the next two centuries the equivalent ON. þeir must have been adopted, as it appears c 1200 in full use in Orm. as þe33, whence the later they, thei, thay, thai, which gradually spread south, and before 1500 superseded hi, hy, first in the nominative, and then also in the other cases, so that the plural forms are now they, them, their. But a relic of the earlier pronoun survives, in southern dialect and colloquial use, in the dat.-accus. hem, commonly written 'em.

3. The original accusative forms have everywhere, except in the neuter, been replaced by an extended use of the dative: this began in the midl. dial. before 1000, and was completed in the southern by 1350. In this change, the analogy of the 1st and persons was followed (see ME). Traces of the original acc. sing. masc. hine remain as en, 'n (un), in southern dialects: see HIM.

4. In the neuter the acc. hit remained, and also displaced the dative him; in all constructions hit lost its initial h between 12th and 15th c. in Standard English; and in 16–17th c. the original neuter genitive his was displaced first by it, and then by it's, its.

5. The genitive cases his, hire, hire, (their), were treated after 1200, on the earlier analogy of mine, thine, our, your, as adjectives, and inflected to agree with substantives; the plurals his-e, hir-e were still used by Wyclif. Like the other possessives, they also developed two forms, an adjective and an absolute, the latter being hers, theirs (the -s of which was originally the possessive 's); hisis was used by Wyclif, but in mod.Eng. his and its take no additional s in the absolute form. Hisn, hern, theirn (perhaps by false analogy with my, mine) appear in 16th c. in midl. counties, but are now only dialectal. The changes which these, originally genitives of the Personal Pronoun, have undergone, make it more convenient in modern grammar to treat them separately as Possessive Pronouns.

The present inflexion of this pronoun (with its derived possessives) is therefore:

SING.	MASC.	FEM.	NEUT.	PLURAL.
Nom.	he	[she]	it	[they]
Acc. / Dat.	him	her	it	[them]
Possess. adj.	his	her	its	[their]
absol.	his	hers	its	[theirs]

The following explanations and illustrations refer only to the nominative singular masculine HE; the other inflexional parts are treated separately, each in its alphabetical place. So also the now colloq. 'EM, formerly HEM 'them', the obs. or dial. HEO (hoo) 'she', HI 'they', HIM (dial. 'en, 'un) 'him', the ME. HEMEN (dial. min, mun) 'them', the early ME. HISE 'her', and HISE 'them', and the dial. HISN, HERN, THEIRN.]

-head (hed), suffix, later form of ME. hêde, hêd, found already in 12th c., but not known in OE., though pointing etymologically to an OE. -hiedu*, -o (obl. cases -hiede) fem., beside OE. -hâd masc., corresp. to OHG. -heit masc. and fem.

This suffix was orig. an independent subst. (OTeut. haidu-z* masc. in Goth. haidus m., manner, way (see Had sb., Hede), which, after coming to be used only in comb., was practically only a suffix of condition or quality. In its primary use, -hede appears to have been appropriate to adjs. as boldhede, biterhede, drunkenhede, fairhede, falshede, etc., but it was soon extended to sbs., as in knyghthede, manhede, maydenhede, wommanhede (all in Chaucer), being thus used indiscriminately with -hâd (-hede, -hood) from OE. -hâd. In Cursor M. fadirhede, faderhade, preistes hede, pristis hade, occur as MS. variants. This led the way finally to the obsolescence of -hede, -head, and the substitution, even in adjs., of -hood, as in mod. falsehood, likelihood, etc. One or two special forms in -head, e. g. godhead, maidenhead (distinguished from godhood, maidenhood), only remain. In Scotch, on the contrary, -hede, -heid, remained the current form, but is now more or less obsolescent. See also Had sb., Hede sb., and -hood.

Heart of grace, phrase. Forms: 6 herto a grosse: 6 hart a grasse, hart of grease, grasse, grace, 6-7 hart at grasse; 6-7 heart of grasse, h. at grasse, 7 h. to grasse, a grasse, 7-8 h. a grace, 6- heart of grace. [Not known before 1530: origin and early form uncertain.

The simple take heart (= F. prendre cœur) is as old or older. The words heart, hart, were both written hert(e, hart in 16th c. Hence it has been surmised that take herte a gresse, or hart of grease, was orig. a punning or sportive expansion of take herte, after the earlier herte of gresse, hart of grease, fat hart (see HART 1 b); and that when the expression became proverbial, attempts were made to put sense into it by substituting grass and grace. Of course, heart of grace might be the original, and all the other forms popular corruptions of it; but it is not easy to explain grace in such a connexion; there is no corresponding F. cœur de grâce. In any case, the number and variety of the forms show that the analysis was not clear even in the 16th c.]

2. As name of a flower or plant. In 16th c. applied both to the Pansy and the Wallflower; at length restricted to the former.

The origin and occasion of the name are not clear. By the mediæval herbalists the pansy and wallflower or wall-gilliflower (as well as the stock gilliflower and other plants) were included in their genus Viola. Of the 16th c. herbalists, Turner 1548-52 has 'heart's ease' only as a name of the wallflower; Lyte in 1578, both of the wallflower ('viola lutea') and 'pances' ('viola tricolor'). But Palsgrave 1530 applies it only to the pansy, and this appears to be the general usage from R. Greene onward.

HOOKE Microgr. 39 A Thermometer, thus marked and prepared, will be the fittest Instrument to make a Standard of heat and cold. 1731 ARBUTHNOT Aliments 6 The Heat in Land Animals helps likewise to the Solution of the Aliment. 1870 JEVONS Elem. Logic xxxiii. 291 Heat means ordinarily the excess of temperature above the ordinary mean.

b. The sensation or perception of this quality or condition; one of the primary sensations, produced by contact with or nearness to fire or any body at a high temperature, and also by various other causes, e.g. by any agency that quickens the circulation of the blood.

(In early use not easily separable from that which causes the sensation, the external or internal quality (senses 1, 4); see esp. quots. 1225, 1375 in 4 c.)

a 1704 [see a]. 1794 J. HUTTON Philos. Light, etc. 19 When we approach the fire, our sense informs us in a particular manner; and this we name heat, which is then purely a sensation. 1855 BAIN Senses & Int. I. i. § 6 We can neither feel nor know heat, except in the transition from cold. 1865-72 WATTS Dict. Chem. III. 25 The word Heat is used in common language, both as the name of a particular kind of sensation, and to denote that condition of matter in which it is capable of producing this sensation in us.

c. With adjectives of colour, used in reference to the appearance of metals and some other substances when at certain high temperatures, as BLUE heat, RED heat, WHITE heat; also with other defining words, as ANIMAL heat, BLOOD-HEAT, FEVER heat, etc.: see these words.

1703 MOXON Mech. Ex. 8 Several degrees of Heats Smiths take of their Iron..As first, a Blood-red Heat. Secondly, a White Flame Heat. Thirdly, a Sparkling, or Welding Heat.

2. In Physics, formerly supposed to be an elastic material fluid (CALORIC), of extreme subtility, attracted and absorbed by all bodies; now held to be a form of ENERGY, viz. the kinetic and potential energy of the invisible molecules of bodies, capable of being transmitted from one body to another, whether in contact (see CONDUCTION 6, CONVECTION) or separated (see RADIATION): in the latter case, the energy during the transmission takes the form of (b.) Radiant heat, which is not properly heat at all, but the energy of vibration of the intervening ether, being identical, within a certain range of wave-length, with light.

1626 BACON Sylva § 99 It is certaine, that of all Powers in Nature, Heat is the chiefe. 1665 R. HOOKE Microgr. 37 Heat is a property of a body arising from the motion or agitation of its parts; and therefore whatever body is thereby toucht must necessarily receive some part of that motion, whereby its parts will be shaken. Ibid. Table 248 Experiments to shew, that bodies expand by heat. 1695 WOODWARD Nat. Hist. Earth III. i. 121 note, Heat and Fire differ but in degree: and Heat is Fire, only in lesser quantity. Fire I shall shew to be a Fluid consisting of Parts extremely small and light and consequently very subtile, active, and susceptive of Motion. a 1704 LOCKE Elem. Nat. Phil. xi. (R.), Heat is a very brisk agitation of the insensible parts of the object; which produces in us that sensation, from whence we denominate the object hot: so what in our sensation is heat, in the object is nothing but motion. 1760 J. BLACK Inq. Nat. Heat 529 But heat is evidently not passive; it is an expansive fluid, which dilates in consequence of the repulsion subsisting among its own particles. 1833 N. ARNOTT Physics (ed. 5) II. 10 Heat cannot be exhibited apart, nor proved to have weight or inertia. c 1860 FARADAY Forces Nat. iii. 79 Whenever we diminish the attraction of cohesion we absorb heat. 1862 H. SPENCER First Princ. II. viii. § 66 That mode of force which we distinguish as Heat, is now generally regarded by physicists as molecular motion. 1879 THOMSON & TAIT Nat. Phil. I. v. § 385 The Dynamical Theory of Heat .. is based upon the conclusion from experiment that heat is a form of energy.

b. 1794 G. ADAMS Nat. & Exp. Philos. I. iv. App. 157 The nature and properties of what has been called radiant heat. 1800 HERSCHEL in Phil. Trans. XC. 291 If we call light, those rays which illuminate objects, and radiant heat, those which heat bodies, it may be inquired, whether light be essentially different from radiant heat? a 1832 SIR J. LESLIE Dissert. in Encycl. Brit. (ed. 7) I. 646/2 Scheele pursued a similar path..[That] which streams immediately from its source in rectilineal directions..he designated [c 1775] by the phrase Radiant Heat, which has since become a favourite appellation. 1834 MRS. SOMERVILLE Connect. Phys. Sc. xxv. (1849) 240 Radiant heat passes through the gases with the same facility as light. 1869 E. A. PARKES Pract. Hygiene (ed. 3) 309 Radiant heat from an open fire.

c. Latent heat (Physics): the heat required to convert a solid into liquid or vapour, or a liquid into vapour; which, as it does not raise the temperature and so become sensible to the touch as warmth, was regarded as being absorbed and remaining latent in the resulting liquid or vapour.

Now viewed as the energy absorbed during the change of state, partly in increasing the molecular potential energy of the body, and partly in compressing external bodies.

c 1757 J. BLACK Lect. (1803) I. 157 Considered as the cause of warmth, we do not perceive its presence; it is concealed or latent, and I gave it the name of latent heat. 1765 REID Let. Wks. I. 42/2, I have attended Dr. Black's lectures hitherto. His doctrine of latent heat is the only thing I have yet heard that is altogether new. 1787 KEIR in Phil. Trans. LXXVII. 277 The heats absorbed and rendered latent, as some late philosophers express themselves. 1799 Phil. Mag. III. 419 A great quantity of vaporific, or, as it is called, latent heat, is carried off by the steam of water. 1830 LYELL Princ. Geol. I. 406 A portion of the steam is at first condensed into water, and the temperature of the water is raised by the latent heat evolved.

d. Specific heat (Physics): the heat required to raise the temperature of a given substance to a given extent (usually one degree); it is calculated relatively to some standard substance, usually water (see quot. 1871), and forms a measure of the given substance's capacity for heat.

a 1832 SIR J. LESLIE in Encycl. Brit. (ed. 7) I. 645/2 The best series of experiments on the distribution of heat among different bodies was performed before the year 1784 by Professor Gadolin of Abo, who, rejecting the notion of Capacity, introduced the unexceptionable expression, Specific Heat. 1842 BRANDE Dict. Sci., etc., s.v., The term specific heat is applied to the quantity of thermometric heat required to raise different substances to the same temperature..The specific heat of water being = 1, that of oil is 0·5. 1863 TYNDALL Heat (1870) 139 As the specific heat increases, the atomic weight diminishes, and vice versa. 1871 MAXWELL The. Heat iii. 66 The Specific Heat of a body is the ratio of the quantity of heat required to raise that body one degree to the quantity required to raise an equal weight of water one degree. 1881 Nature No. 627. 15 Platinum has a specific heat of only ·032.

e. Atomic heat, molecular heat (Chem.): the product of the specific heat of a substance into its atomic or molecular weight: see quots.

1850 GRAHAM Elem. Chem. I. 139 The atomic heat of bodies, as it is named by this chemist [M. Regnault, 1841], is obtained by multiplying the observed specific heat of each body by its equivalent. 1865-72 WATTS Dict. Chem. III. 37 Within certain classes of allied compounds .. the molecular heats of the substances .. or the products of their specific heats into their molecular weights .. are approximately equal .. As a rule, the molecular heat of solid compound bodies increases with the number of atoms contained in their molecule.

b. The ordinary name for undershrubs of the Linnæan genus Erica, of which the common native species are E. (now Calluna) vulgaris, common heath, heather, or ling, E. cinerea fine-leaved heath (the 'common heath' of some parts), and E. tetralix cross-leaved heath. By botanical writers sometimes limited to the modern genus Erica, sometimes extended to other cognate genera of Ericaceæ.

The name heath seems native to the south and middle of England: see HEATHER. Since the 'common heath' is now separated from the genus Erica, botanical writers sometimes distinguish it from the 'true heaths' by its northern names LING and HEATHER; but locally all three names include all the native species. Of early botanical writers, Turner mentions only E. vulgaris, Lyte (transl. Dodoens), E. vulgaris and tetralix, distinguished as 'long heath' and 'smal heath'.

[OE. hǽðen = OFris. hēthin, -en, OS. hēðin (MDu., Du. heiden), OHG. heidan (MHG. heiden, Ger. heide), ON. heiðinn (Sw., Da. heden; cf. Goth. haiþnô Gentile or heathen woman.

As this word is used in all the Germanic langs. in the sense 'non-Christian, pagan', which could only have arisen after the introduction of Christianity, it is thought probable that, like some other terms of Christian origin (e.g. church), it was first used in Gothic, and thence passed to the other tribes. This is supported by the use by Ulfilas, in Mark vii. 26, of the fem. form haiþnô (Vulg. mulier gentilis, all OE. versions hǽðen). The word has generally been assumed to be a direct derivative of Gothic haiþi, Heath, as if 'dweller on the heath', taken as a kind of loose rendering of L. pāgānus orig. 'villager, rustic', later, after Christianity became the religion of the towns, while the ancient deities were still retained in rural districts, 'pagan, heathen'). But in this there are difficulties chronological and etymological, esp. in reference to the form and use of the suffix; and Prof. S. Bugge (Indog. Forsch. V. 178) includes this among several words which point to Armenian influence on the language of Ulfilas; he takes haiþno as indicating a masc. haiþans, which he refers to Armenian het'anes 'heathen', ad. Gr. ἔθνος 'nation', pl. 'nations, Gentiles, heathens'. This would explain the OHG. form heidan, while in OE., etc., the suffix was, as in cristen, levelled under the ordinary -in, -en, from -in. But even so, the stem-vowel has prob. to be explained by assimilation to haiþi heath.]

A. adj. 1. Applied to persons or races whose religion is neither Christian, Jewish, nor Mohammedan; pagan; Gentile. In earlier times applied also to Mohammedans; but in modern usage, for the most part, restricted to those holding polytheistic beliefs, esp. when uncivilized or uncultured.

Heather (he·ðəɹ). Forms: 4, 6 hathir, 5 had(d)yr, 6 haddir, hedder, 6-7 hadder, 6-8 hather, 8 hether, 8- heather. [Of uncertain origin: commonly viewed as related to heath; but the form heather appears first in 18th c., and the earlier hadder seems on several grounds to discountenance such a derivation. The word appears to have been originally confined to Scotland (with the contiguous part of the English Border); the northern Engl. equivalent, as in Yorkshire, etc., being ling, from Norse. The word heath, on the other hand, seems to be native only in Southern and Midland counties, and never to have been applied to the Yorkshire or Scottish 'moors'; it is only in comparatively recent times that the southern English heath and the Sc. hadder, hedder, have been associated, and the spelling heather thence introduced. On the analogy of adder, bladder, ladder, now in Sc. ether, blether, lether, and of Eng. feather, together, weather, we should expect heather to go back through hedder, hadder, to a type hæddr or hæddre.]

1. The Scotch name, now in general use, for the native species of the Linnæan genus Erica, called in the north of England, LING; especially E. (now Calluna) vulgaris, Common Heather, and E. cinerea, Fine-leaved Heath or Lesser Bell-heather.

Some recent botanical writers have essayed to limit the originally local names heath, ling, heather, to different species; but each of these names is, in its own locality, applied to all the species there found, and pre-eminently to that locally most abundant. On the Yorkshire and Scottish moors, the most abundant is E. vulgaris, which is therefore the 'Common Ling' of the one, the 'Common Heather' of the other. But in other localities, esp. in the south-west, E. cinerea is the prevalent species, and is there the 'Common Heath'. Scottish distinctions are Dog-heather, He-heather (E. vulgaris), Curlin h., She-heather (E. cinerea).

Originally belonging to the same ablaut-series as shake, shave, but subseq. affected by many changes. The present stem haff- had orig. a formative j (—L. -i- in cap-i-ō), which caused umlaut of the stem vowel, giving OE. ę, ME. e, lengthened by position to ē, ea. The WGer. gemination of ff, giving bb in OS. and OE., affected all parts of the present stem, exc. 2nd and 3rd sing. pres. Ind. and sing. Imp., giving hebbe, hebbað, hebban, hebbende, beside hefest, hefeþ, hefe. In ME. the bb forms were retained (in the south) till 14th c., but were at length everywhere reduced by levelling to f (later v). The pa. t. hōf came down as hove; but in ME. this was largely displaced by a type hæf, heaf, hēf, hēve, and another haf, have, both of which survived till 15th c. The OE. pa. pple. hafen was by the 12th c. abandoned for hofen (later hoven, hove), with o from the pa. t.; there are also traces of heven (cf. OFris. and Du.). But, beside these strong inflexions, there appeared also in late OE. (as in some of the other langs.) weak inflexions hefde, hefod; these gained ground in ME., and esp. in mod.Eng., in which heaved is now the general form, though hove remains in certain uses. The original sense, as evidenced by various derivatives, as well as by L. capĕre, was 'take', whence, through 'take up', came that of 'lift, raise', already developed in Com. Teut.

The close correspondence to Latin is seen in comparing capio, capis, capit, capiunt with OTeut. hafję*, hafis, hafiþ, hafjanþ, OLG. hebbiu, hēbis, hēbiđ, hebbiađ, OE. hebbe, hęfest(t), hęfeþ, hebbađ. Since heave is thus certainly cognate with capĕre, it must be originally quite distinct from have, if the latter is = L. habēre. The two verbs however come close together in various forms in most of the langs., and their derivatives have probably influenced each other, so that it is difficult in some instances to know whether these belong to hafjan 'heave' or haƀƀn 'have'.]

A modified arm in male dibranchiate Cephalopods, which serves as a generative organ, and in some species is detached and remains in the pallial cavity of the female; in this position formerly mistaken for a parasite, to which the name Hectocotylus octopodis was given by Cuvier.

1854 WOODWARD Mollusca (1856) 65 Dr. Albert Kölliker has suggested that the real males .. are the hectocotyles, previously mistaken for parasitic worms. The hectocotyle of octopus granulatus was described by Cuvier, who obtained several specimens from octopods captured in the Mediterranean. 1877 HUXLEY Anat. Inv. Anim. viii. 538 The male is very much smaller than the female, and gives rise to a Hectocotylus.

Hence Hectoco·tylize v. trans., (a) to convert or modify into a hectocotyle; (b) to impregnate with a hectocotyle. Hectocotylisa·tion, the process of hectocotylizing. Hectoco·tylism, the formation of a hectocotyle.

Anim.* viii. 530 The male Cephalopods are distinguished . by the asymmetry of their arms, one or more of which, on one side, are peculiarly modified, or hectocotylised. Ibid. 534 There is thus a kind of hectocotylisation in the Tetrabranchiata. 1878 BELL Gegenbaur's Comp. Anat. 397 This 'hectocotylised arm' is not developed, as are the others, by a process of free gemmation, but it is formed in a vesicle, from which it is not let loose till it is mature. Ibid. 386 Hectocotylism is the cause therefore of a functional adaptation.

1. The person who is entitled by law to succeed another in the enjoyment of property or rank, upon the death of the latter; one who so succeeds; in general use, one who receives or is entitled to receive property of any kind as the legal representative of a former owner.

The word is correctly applied to either a male or a female, although, in the latter sense, HEIRESS has been in general use since 17th c. In Law a person is not called an heir to any property until, through the death of its possessor, he becomes entitled to it (nemo est hæres viventis). As to the limitations of the word in Common Law and in the Civil Law and systems founded thereon, see quots. 1651, 1861, 1876.

The 'heir' is the person on whom the real estate of a deceased intestate devolves. He is opposed to the devisee who is the person to whom real property is left by will, and to the executor or administrator who succeed to the personal estate.

b. With qualifications:

Heir-at-law: the person who succeeds another by right of blood in the enjoyment of his property; in English law confined to one who has such a right in real property, and distinguished from executors or administrators. Heir of blood: see quot. 1658. Heir of the body: an heir who is a direct descendant: see BODY 12 b. Heir in capite: the heir to land held directly of the sovereign. Heir of conquest (Sc. Law): the heir of an ancestor who acquired the estate in question by purchase and not by succession (see CONQUEST sb. 6). Heir by custom: one who succeeds by virtue of a particular or local custom, e.g. Borough English, under which the youngest son succeeds his father. Heir by destination (Sc. Law): 'the person who is entitled to succeed, failing the person to whom an estate is disponed' (Bell Dict. Law Scotl.). Heir by devise: 'he who is made, by will, the testator's heir or devisee, and has no other right or interest than the will gives him' (Wharton Law Lex.). Heir of entail = Heir in tail. Heir female: an heiress; also an heir (male or female) whose rights are derived through a female or females. Heir general = Heir-at-law: used to include heirs female as well as heirs male. Heir of inheritance: see quot. 1658 s.v. heir of blood. Heir of investiture (Sc. Law) = Beneficiary heir (see below). Heir of line (Sc. Law) = Heir-at-Law. Heir male: an heir who is a male, and who traces his descent from the ancestor in question wholly through males. Heir portioner (Sc. Law): see quots. Heir of provision = Heir by destination. Heir presumptive: he who, if the ancestor should die immediately, would be his heir, but whose right of inheritance may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born. Heir special: (a) = Heir by custom; (b) one to whom an estate passes by virtue of letters patent or a deed of entail. Heir in tail (Sc. of entail, of tailzie): the person who succeeds or is entitled to succeed to an entailed estate by virtue of the deed of entail; tenant in tail in remainder. See also HEIR-APPARENT.

Beneficiary heir (Sc. Law): an apparent heir in heritage who enters upon his predecessor's estate subject to a formal inventory being made, in order to avoid liability for debts beyond the amount stated in such inventory. Collateral heir: see COLLATERAL a. 4. Conventional heir: one who is entitled by virtue of a contract. Forced heir (Civ. Law): a person who cannot be disinherited. Last heir: see quot. 1697. Right heir = heir-at-law.

2. Having, or taking, the sun as centre: as the heliocentric (or Copernican) system of astronomy. (See B.)

1834 Nat. Philos. III. Gloss. s.v. Geocentric (U. K. Heliotropic (hĭ·lĭotrŏ·pik), a. Bot. [f. Gr. ἥλιος sun + -τροπος turning + -ic; or ad. F. héliotropique.] Bending or turning in a particular direction under the influence of light; pertaining to or marked by heliotropism. Said of, or in reference to, growing parts of plants, which may be positively heliotropic, i.e. bend towards the light (the most usual case), or negatively heliotropic (Apheliotropic), i.e. bend away from it, or Diaheliotropic, q.v.

1875 Bennett & Dyer Sachs' Bot. 676 The fact of heliotropic curvature towards the side which receives the most light. Ibid. 677 There are a much smaller number which bend in the opposite direction, i.e. become concave on the shaded side. In order to distinguish between them the former are termed positively, the latter negatively heliotropic. 1880 C. & F. Darwin Movem. Pl. 418 Heliotropic movements are determined by the direction of the light.

So Heliotro·pical a. (rare −0) = prec.; hence Heliotro·pically adv.

Heliotropism (hĭ·lĭŏ·trŏpiz'm). Bot. [mod. f. Gr. ἥλιος sun + -τροπος turning: see -ism. In F. héliotropisme (1832, De Candolle, Physiol. Végét. II. 844), mod.L. and Ger. heliotropismus.]

The property, exhibited by growing parts of plants, of bending or turning in a particular manner under the influence of light. The most usual case (to which some restrict the term) is that of bending towards the light (positive heliotropism); that of bending away from it is distinguished as negative heliotropism or Apheliotropism; that of taking a direction at right angles to it, as transverse heliotropism or Diaheliotropism.

1854 Mayne Expos. Lex., Heliotropismus, term for that faculty by which certain plants constantly turn their flowers to the sun: heliotropism. 1875 Bennett & Dyer Sachs' Bot. 677 Both positive and negative heliotropism occur not only in organs containing chlorophyll, but also in those that are colourless. Ibid. 775 The positive heliotropism of twining internodes is generally feeble. 1880 Nature XXI. 438 The Electric Light .. produced heliotropism in plants exposed to it. 1880 C. & F. Darwin Movem. Pl. 5 Authors speak of positive and negative heliotropism..but it is much more convenient to confine the word heliotropism to bending towards the light.

Helio·tropy. rare. [f. Helio- + Gr. -τροπία turning. Cf. F. héliotropie.] = prec.

1883 Nat. Educ. XXIV. No. 6. 6 The author applies the name selenotropy to these motions, as contrasted with heliotropy produced by the sun.

Heliotype (hĭ·lĭotəip). [f. Helio- + Gr. τύπος impression, print, Type.] A picture obtained by printing from a film of gelatine which has been sensitized with bichromate of potash and exposed to light under a negative; also, the process by which such a picture is produced. Also attrib.

1870 Echo 4 Nov., Art..presents its readers with four splendid heliotype pictures. 1874 Abney Instr. Photogr. xiii. (1886) 297 In the heliotype process a film of gelatine is prepared on a glass plate, from which it is stripped when dry, and printed in the ordinary manner. Ibid. 303 The great secret of producing a good heliotype is to have first-rate rollers at command. 1883 R. Halidane Workshop Receipts Ser. II. 188/2 The most important of the many modifications of the collotype process is the 'heliotype' invented by Ernest Edwards.

So He·liotyped ppl. a., produced by the heliotype process; Heliotypic (-ti·pik) a., of or belonging to the heliotype process; He·liotypy (-təipi), the heliotype process.

Helispherical (helisfe·rikăl), a. [irreg. f. Helix + Spherical.] Winding spirally upon a sphere.

Helispherical line: the line traced upon the terrestrial sphere by a ship sailing constantly towards the same point of the compass (other than the four cardinal points), which winds spirally round the pole, continually approaching but never reaching it; otherwise called the loxodromic curve or rhumb-line.

Helium (hē·lĭăm). Chem. [mod.L., f. Gr. ἥλιος sun, with the termination already used in selenium, tellurium, etc.] One of the chemical elements, a transparent gas, first actually obtained by Prof. Ramsay in 1895, its existence in the sun's atmosphere having been inferred by Lockyer in 1868 from a certain line (D_3) in the spectrum of the solar prominences. (Cf. Coronium.) Symbol He.

†Hem, 'em (ĕm), pers. pron., 3*rd pl., dat.-acc.* Forms: see below. [1. Originally OE. him, hiom, heom, dat. pl. in all genders of HE, = OFris. him (hiam), MDu. hem, hem, hom, dat.; hem, him, acc. (Cf. Goth., OHG., OS. im in same sense.) 2. In 10th c. him, heom began in north midl. dial. to be substituted for the acc. pl. HI, hia, etc.; by 1150 the dative had quite supplanted the accusative in midl. dial., and was encroaching on it in south., and by 1350 hem had supplanted hi in south. also, the dative and accusative being thus identified under the form hem. (Cf. the history of HIM, ME.) 3. In 10th c. we see þæm dat. pl. of the demonstrative THAT, THE, sometimes used in the north instead of him, heom (perhaps as more emphatic); by 1200 we find þeȝm, þeym (from ON. þeim = OE. þæm, þām) beside hemm in Ormin (north midl.); and þaim, thaim, was the regular northern ME. form. In 15th c. theym and hem are both used by Caxton, as more and less emphatic. After 1500 them is the standard form, hem (usually written 'em) surviving only as a subordinate weak form, chiefly colloquial, in which capacity it is still used in the south (see 'EM). In the 13th c. hem was sometimes combined as -m with another pronoun, as hem = he 'em, him = hi hem; and in 14th c. was appended to vbs. as sendem, identical with modern send 'em. In some s.w. dialects, them has not yet displaced hem, 'em; but in the north no trace of hem has been left for 700 years. 'Day-blindness'; a visual defect in which the eyes see indistinctly, or not at all, by daylight, but tolerably well by night or artificial light. (But used by many in the sense of 'night-blindness', Nyctalopia.)

'Day-blindness' is the etymological meaning of the word, and the sense in which ἡμεράλωψ, as the contrary of νυκτάλωψ, was used by Galen. But, as Nyctalopia was, from an early date, taken by some in the opposite sense, these also reversed the etymological sense of hemeralopia, and used it as = 'night-blindness', 'day-sight', as if the word were hemeropia. 'With the exception of Copland and Henry Power, all or most modern authors .. have used the term in the sense of night-blindness. The Royal College of Physicians of London have reverted to the true meaning of the word in their "Nomenclature of Diseases"' (Syd.

Soc. Lex.). But the Medical Dictionary of F. P. Foster, New York, 1891, continues the non-etymological sense of 'day-vision, night-blindness'. The word was rightly used by Paré in 16th c.: Œuvres xv. 3 (Littré) Le contraire est quand on voit mieux de nuit que de jour, et se peut dire hemeralopia en grec, œil de chat en françois.

Several Gr. words containing this element were in use as technical terms in later L., e.g. hēmicyclium, hēmina, hēmisphærium, hēmistichium. In the modern langs. they are very numerous, not only in terms adopted or adapted from Gr. (directly or through L.), but in new formations, scientific or technical, from Greek, or on Greek analogies. Words formed from Latin have the corresponding prefix SEMI-; but there are instances of hybridism in the use of both prefixes.]

Half-; one half, the half, pertaining to or affecting one half; esp. in Anat., Biol., and Path. Pertaining to one of the two halves (right and left) of the body, or of any of its symmetrical organs.

b. c. In Chemistry, formerly applied to binary compounds in which the combining proportion of the electro-negative or chlorous radical, was supposed to be one half that of the electro-positive or basylous radical, as in 'hemichloride of copper', Cu_2Cl (now $Cu''Cl$ or Cu_2Cl_2, cuprous chloride), 'hemioxide of copper', Cu_4O (now Cu_2O, cuprous oxide). These were called hemi-compounds. So hemi-hydrate, a compound of one molecule of hydroxyl (HO) with two molecules of an element or radical. Now frequently used to form the name of a derivative body, in which some constituent is present in half the proportion, or in a smaller proportion, than in other members of the group, as in hemibromhydrin, $2C_3H_6O_3 + HBr - 4H_2O$ (compared with monobromhydrin, $C_3H_8O_3 + HBr - H_2O$), or which forms one of the two substances into which a body may be split up, as in hemialbumin, hemicollin.

The latinized hengestmannus in 1364 suggests immediate formation from OE. hengest; but there is the difficulty that no trace of the latter appears after c 1205 (exc. as an element of proper names, where OE. Hengestes became Hinx-, Hinks-, Hinckes- in accordance with the normal phonetic change of OE. eng to later ing). On the other hand though hengest was also M.L.G., and henst, heynst, henst the MDu. forms, and Hans Wynsele in quot. 1377 was evidently of 'Dutch' or German nativity, no example of the compound hengestman, or henxtman, is found in these languages. (Mod.G. hengstmann, 'groom of a stallion', is recent and technical.) As to the original sense, the Promp. Parv. renders heyncemann by med.L. gerolocista; a contemporary L.-E. glossary, Wr.-Wülcker 586/21, has 'gerolotista, sompturman' (cf. also 582/11 'Falerarius, a sompterhors; falerator, a sompterman'). Gerolocista (in Du Cange also gerulaustæ) was app. a deriv. of L. gerulus 'carrier, porter', also 'sumpter-horse': cf. Promp. Parv., 'Male horse [OF. male, F. malle trunk], gerulus, somarius'; 'somer hors, gerulus, somarius, summarius.' These equivalents seem to point to the sense 'attendant on a sumpter-horse'; perh. the original meaning was simply 'attendant on a horse', 'groom', which might rise to be an honourable title, as in the current 'Groom-in-waiting', 'Groom of the chamber': cf. also the history of marshal, originally 'horse-servant', 'groom'. The 'hengestmanni, Mustard and Garleke', of 1363, the 'harlottez and hansemene' in Morte Arthur, and the 'henxmen and lackies' of P. Holland (1 b), were apparently of the rank of ordinary grooms; but in connexion with the English court, the word came to connote a position of honour, and the royal henchmen of the 15-16th c. were usually young men of rank. In its historical sense, the word appears to have become obs. by 1650 (see sense 1); for the modern use see sense 2. (See the discussion of this word in N. & Q. 7th s. II, 111, 8th s. III, etc.; also Skeat, Student's Pastime, several articles.)]

1. a. ? A groom. b. A squire, or page of honour to a prince or great man, who walked or rode beside him in processions, progresses, marches, etc.; also, one who, on occasion, fulfilled the same office to a queen or princess. In later 16th c. use, app. = HENCH-BOY. Obs. (exc. Hist.) since 17th c.

Henry, Earl of Derby, afterwards Henry IV, had in his retinue, in his Expedition to Prussia and Palestine 1392-3, 'two henxmen', to whom there are many references in the Accounts (edited by Miss L. Toulmin Smith for Camd. Soc.), cited in quot. 1392. In 1402, two 'henxtmen' accompanied Henry's daughter Blaunche from Cologne to the parts of Almaine, whither she went as a bride. From the 14th cent., henxmen or henchmen formed part of the regular household or suite of English kings and queens, their number rising from three under Henry VI to seven under Edward IV and Richard III, under the command of the Master of the Horse. At the coronation of Richard III in 1483, his queen had also five henchmen riding on 'womens sadelles'. In 15-16th c. nobles and knights also had their henchmen, usually three. The royal henchmen or 'chyldren of honor' were abolished by Queen Elizabeth in 1565 (see quot.); and the word, though still frequent in transferred and analogical uses c 1600, app. became obs. in English use by 1650. (Cf. also HENCH-BOY, which continued in practical use to c 1675.)

2. The personal attendant, 'right-hand man', or chief gillie of a Highland chief; hence, generally, a trusty follower or attendant who stands by the side of his chief or leader, and supports him in every case of need.

This sense begins app. with Burt, who spells hanchman, and explains it as derived from haunch, i. e. HAUNCH; hence Scott (who edited Burt) has hanchman in Waverley, but elsewhere, in the same sense, uses henchman, thus identifying Burt's and his own 'hanchman' with the obsolete Eng. 'henchman'; the rest of the world has taken the word from Scott. It does not appear whence or how Burt got the word: there is no term corresponding to 'haunch-man' in Gaelic (Burt himself, a few sentences on, calls the same individual simply gilly), and it is uncertain whether he himself invented the term, or really found the obs. Eng. henchman retained in a modified sense in some part of the Highlands. In any case, association between henchman and hanchman was very natural: haunch in Scotch is pronounced hainch, hench (see HAUNCH *sb.*¹, 7-8), 'haunch-man', if it existed, would be pronounced hainchman or henchman, and the Eng. 'henchman', if in any way known, would be there naturally taken as = 'man at the hench or haunch'.

Heptarchy (he·ptaiki). [ad. mod.L. heptarchia, f. Gr. ἑπτά HEPTA- + -αρχία sovereignty, empire, after tetrarchy.] A government by seven rulers; an aggregate of seven districts or petty kingdoms, each under its own ruler; spec. the seven kingdoms reckoned to have been established by the Angles and Saxons in Britain.

The term appears to have been introduced by 16th c. historians, in accordance with their notion that there were seven Angle and Saxon kingdoms so related that one of their rulers had always the supreme position of King of the Angle-kin (Rex gentis Anglorum), 'so that in the Heptarchy itself there seems always to have been a Monarchy' (Camden). The correctness and propriety of the designation have been often called in question, but its practical convenience has preserved it in use. Already in Ormin, the use of heore, here, was encroached upon by that of þeggre from Old Norse, which, in the form thair, the northern texts of Cursor Mundi, Hampole, etc. have exclusively; Chaucer and other southern and south-midland writers retained her; Caxton, like Ormin, had both her and their; but their appears to have prevailed before 1500, and her has long disappeared even from the dialects which retain the cognate dat.-accus. hem, 'em.]

Diez suggested as a possible source an OGer. hariwald*, heriwald*, 'wielder' or 'commander of an army', citing the proper names Chariovaldus, OS. Hariolt, ON. Haraldr; but this seems to fail to explain the sense. Others have suggested a possible derivation from OHG. harên, herên to cry, call, which suits the sense better, but involves other difficulties. See Markel, German. elem. in französisch (1887) 62.]
